LAWS REGARDING USING CELL PHONES/HEADPHONES/TEXTING WHILE DRIVING

Every year, more than 170 billion cell phone texts are sent and received. Each year, an average of 3,000 people die and 450,000 are injured in motor vehicle accidents involving distracted drivers. Ten percent of all drivers who are 15 to 19 years of age involved in fatal crashes were distracted when the accident occurred. The significant safety problem of operating a cell phone, sending or receiving texts, or manipulating hand-held devices while driving has grown exponentially over the past decade and has reached epidemic proportions. According to the National Highway Transportation Safety Administration (NHTSA), at any given moment across America, approximately 660,000 drivers are using or manipulating cell phones while driving. Lawyers and insurance claims professionals should be familiar with the nuances of these laws in the states in which they conduct business. Automobile accidents are caused by a variety of factors, but a growing cause of accidents is the use of electronic hand-held devices and texting while driving. State legislatures are scrambling to make their roads safe by passing laws which prohibit dangerous activity yet do not totally infringe on the personal liberty of Americans. It is no easy task. A defendant’s use of a cell phone at or around the time of an accident is easy to determine and can be particularly damaging in a negligence lawsuit wherein the defendant’s actions are being scrutinized.

The following chart is a summary of current law across all 50 states governing the use of cell phones, texting, and/or the manipulation of hand-held electronic devices while driving. Every state is different, and some states have no legislation whatsoever. Related laws governing the use of headphones or other devices which would impair a driver’s attention or hearing are also included where relevant.
