STATUTES OF LIMITATIONS FOR ALL 50 STATES

A statute of limitations (SOL) specifies a time period for commencing suit on a given claim that begins to run, or is triggered, when the cause of action accrues. When a cause of action “accrues” generally depends on the particular state involved, but it is usually when an accident occurs or when a claimant “discovers” the resulting injury. While a statute of limitations takes effect when a claim arises, a statute of repose bars the bringing of a suit after a set period of time, regardless of whether an injury occurred, or a claim has arisen. The time limit for bringing suit established by a statute of repose is triggered by a specified event, such as the substantial completion of an improvement to real property, the date a product was used, or the date a product was sold.

All fifty (50) states currently have statutes of repose, varying in both the type of claim covered by the statute and the length of the repose period. Forty-six (46) states have a statute of repose which apply to actions involving real property design, engineering, and construction. However, nineteen (19) states also have statutes of repose limiting product liability claims.

The court can extend the time for service “upon good cause shown or in the interest justice.” N.Y. C.P.L.R. § 306-b. A showing of reasonable diligence is one factor to be considered by the Court. “Good cause” and “the interest of justice” are two separate standards that govern an extension of the time for service, and both may consider diligence. However, it is only the former standard that requires reasonable diligence as a threshold matter; “the interest of justice” may consider a wider range of factors. Leader v.
