TEXAS STOCK LAWS BY COUNTY

There are two kinds of counties in Texas when it comes to auto/livestock cases. Those counties who have adopted “Stock Laws” and those who have not. The default rule in Texas is that the State is open range, meaning that absent an exception discussed below, land in Texas is considered open range. This distinction was made by the Texas Supreme Court in 1893. “It is the right of every owner of domestic animals in this state...to allow them to run large.” See Clarendon Land, Investment & Agency Co. v. McClelland, 23 S.W. 576 (1893). If a county has not adopted a Stock Law, then it is considered an open range county and the owner of the livestock is only liable to a vehicle owner if the accident occurred on a state or U.S. highway, or if the animal owner knew the animal was not fenced and allowed it to escape or run free. It is worth noting that an animal owner cannot sue a driver for negligence for hitting an animal unless the animal owner can prove gross negligence or willful conduct by the driver. This is codified in Texas Agric. Code § 143.103 and applies regardless of whether a county has or has not adopted the stock law.

The authority granting counties the power to have an election to adopt “stock law” is granted under Chapter 143 of the Texas Agriculture Code. As to counties that have adopted stock laws there does not have to be a written code/ordinance/regulation. All we need to know is whether the county has “adopted a stock law”. When an election occurs, the ballot might simply state “Adopt Stock Law”. If it passes by a simple majority, then there is a Stock Law. The election of Stock Law generally goes into effect within 30 days of the Stock Law being adopted. This chart only looks at the election date, and the not the date the stock law went into effect. If the election date has a “*” next to it on the chart, we have a copy of the actual election order from that particular county. It should be noted that in some counties, the actual election orders have not been found yet by county officials. We will continue to update this chart as additional information is found.

Stock laws in Texas can be different based on what animals are sought to be “fenced in” and are codified within the Texas Agriculture Code.

The Texas Agriculture Code modifies the status of land abutting a U.S. or state highway by deeming the land closed range. This makes all land abutting a U.S. or state highway closed range. See Texas Agriculture Code §§ 143.101 – 143.108.

There are 22 counties which are legislatively prevented from having closed ranges for cattle. The following counties may not conduct a countywide election on the running at large of cattle: Andrews, Coke, Culberson, Hardin, Hemphill, Hudspeth, Jasper, Jefferson, Kenedy, Kinney, LaSalle, Loving, Motley, Newton, Presidio, Roberts, Schleicher, Terry, Tyler, Upton, Wharton, or Yoakum. Texas Agric. Code § 143.072. These counties are open range as they relate to cattle only. The counties may pass elections for other species of animals.

The following chart is a summary of the stock law adoptions by county for the State of Texas based on information that us publicly available.
